Description: Why have urban reformers repeatedly sought to let the poor and unemployed use vacant lots? I explain the enduring appeal of projects that reallocate rights to use idle land by comparing three periods of urban farming and gardening in Chicago, from the Progressive Era to the present. These moments reveal the limits and possibilities of redistribution achieved not via tax and transfer, but rather by experimenting with the rules, norms, and forms of urban property.

Nate Ela is an Instructor at Northwestern Pritzker School of Law and a Visiting Scholar at the American Bar Foundation. He received his Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Wisconsin-Madison and a J.D. from Harvard Law School. His recent work on property, social policy, and human rights has appeared in Law & Social Inquiry and the Fordham Urban Law Review, and is forthcoming in Social Science History.