Description: Mahoney's talk will build a framework for identifying and analyzing critical events in case study research. The framework suggests a new counterfactual approach for measuring the importance of individual causes in particular cases. As a running example, Mahoney will consider whether the election of George W. Bush was a critical event for the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003.

James Mahoney is the Gordon Fulcher Professor in Decision-Making at Northwestern University. His fields of interest include development, political sociology, macrosocial theory, and comparative-historical methodology.
