Description: This talk explores how African-Americans scholars consider the social utility of scholarship beyond the higher educational setting. It draws upon various frameworks for assessing the connection of scholarship to different publics in order to make a case for how African Americans scholars who study the African-American experience regard the public impact of work that is generally designed to address social inequality, social justice, and related concerns.

Alford Young Jr. is Arthur F. Thurnau Professor of Sociology and Afro American and African Studies at the University of Michigan. His research focuses on the plight of African-American men in urban communities and on the experiences and worldviews of African-Americans college who study the African-American experience. He is the past chair of the Department of Sociology at the University of Michigan.